THE CARTOGRAPHER OF MEMORY

Boluwatife Afolabi

Poems
Praise for The Cartographer of Memory

“In The Cartographer of Memory, Olu Afolabi courts the sensual and the metaphysical. In his poetic reckoning, mapping memory requires both an individual and collective meshwork. He lets memory mingle with imagination and his cartography becomes a metaphor for affection, perception and discovery.”
— Dami Ajayi
Writer, Critic

“We could as well call this the "Cartographer of Voices". What the poet does, with much heart, is burrow into voices and speak with their tonalities. He takes it further, questing with scorching tenderness and the sort of rare kindness which only proceeds from forgiveness. I have said our generations' point of turning is our gospel, in poetry of the republic of tenderness. And love. The voice here is full of love.”
— Gbenga Adesina
Joint Winner, 2016 Brunel Poetry Prize
StarWorks Poetry Fellow at New York University

“In poems that reveal a clarity and depth of understanding that one seldom sees but always seeks, Olu Afolabi writes about our world today — from the suffering in Syria to the search for love in dark places — with a grace and brilliance that suggests he has the gift all of the great poets have.”
— John Guzlowski Author, Echoes of Tattered Tongues Winner of the Eric Hoffer/Montaigne Award “With Afolabi’s work, he answers the primordial need for poetry to exist—empathy both with the distant and the familiar. Olu Afolabi's work abounds with hope, emerges as fresh, and is an important collation of focal points in a world plagued with distractions.”

— Yinka Elujoba
Art critic. Author, Collective Truth

“Olu Afolabi remembers the dead, the missing, the broken, children underneath a bridge hiding from water, failed attempts at love and other events we so often let go unacknowledged, unrecorded. The world suffers severe bouts of forgetfulness and The Cartographer of Memory is a dose of Memantine.”

— Moyosore Orimoloye
Joint Winner, 2016 Babishai Niwe Poetry Prize
THE CARTOGRAPHER OF MEMORY

Boluwatife Afolabi
Acknowledgements

Special thanks to the editors of the publications in which versions of the following poems first appeared:

'A Game of Numbers' — Money and Power issue of Saraba Magazine.
'Conversations (with Rafka)' — Praxis Magazine.
'Inamorata' — Expound Magazine.
‘Breathe' was published on Arts and Africa as 'Healing is a woman' Contents

Foreword
Poet’s Statement

Fragile
A Game of Numbers
Sabar
Breathe
Captive
Conversations
Dead Men
For Women Who Break Often
If Anything, Be A Dream
Inamorata
Initiation
Introspection
To Love is to Die
Seeking Shelter
A Memento for the Forgotten
RATIONALE

Author’s Profile
About SankofaMag
Foreword

Before our very eyes, the poetry of Boluwatife Afolabi has emerged, as butterfly from cocoon, and taken dainty flight. It is a privilege to witness these protean moments and to relish the ineffable joy they yield.

This chapbook has seen prior incarnations. In the way that the wind happens to the place with most of the tall grass, Afolabi’s inspiration has settled on those boughs that most exercise our sentience and our humanity. He, the poet, has come a long way from where he started. If the trajectories mapped in these poems are any indication, this poet is one to watch.

I'm chuffed, to be asked to write this introduction to a poet of enormous promise and potential. I am amazed at the quality of mind and poetics deployed in this chapbook. I've watched the unfurling of the banner. Seeing it flying the crest of Afolabi’s imagination with the first rays of this new day bolsters my faith in the future of African poetry.

The poems here are shaped by a vigilant intelligence and an astute understanding of what matters. They have an emotional depth to them that belie the age or experience of the poet. In these poems, one inexorably comes to agree with the sage who observed that good poems know more than the poet does.
In a time when hunger for fame and undisguised greed for money has come to describe some self-styled poets, it is truly refreshing to encounter a true poet. True poets are moved by what they can give, what they can describe, what they can create - not merely what they can get.

Afolabi's poems are pollinators, they are butterflies to be admired for their damask, yes, but they are way more than what appears. They keep the cycle of energy and life going. This, ultimately, is what we are wired for. This is why poems such as are here contained will always matter.

— Tade Ipadeola
Author, The Sahara Testaments
My poetry bears witness to the evolution of the human consciousness. To record, to heal, to serve as triggers of memory. Sometimes, it doesn't heal, and rereading words break me. But I'd rather become a sea of memory than to have existed without having written.

The delight in the recognition of our shared humanity (in loss, in suffering, in love) is what spurs me. The desire to become a lens through which a shred of emotion can be viewed in full detail, absorbed, felt. There is nothing more glorious.
“Certain truths, you hold them against the light and they change colour.”
— Clifton Gachagua
Fragile
(for her new lover)
_after Gbenga Adesina_

With her, you will come to learn that it is okay to be soft in love like silk, like wet hair.
She will teach you to say the names of your old lovers into the wind without breaking into water again; how the other name for god is love and how open hearts can be prison doors.
Her tongue, an alloy of fire and magic that burns and soothes in lost languages, you know this because there are nights when you come back cold, splintered in hidden places in need of mending and she will breathe into your bones and tell you in whispers that men are fragile things.
And you will laugh the way men do but offer no rebut to her.
A Game of Numbers

Say an arbitrary night (could be moonless or not depending on the mood of the universe)

Say a man,
—our protagonist walks into a street and it swallows him whole

Say in this street he stumbles into another man's dream.
—our antagonist

Say he gets trapped and our antagonist walks up to him olive branch in hand offering him terms of freedom—

'A game of number and words' to see how much of memory, he carried with him into this dream:

59?
27.05.14 in a Northern night accompanied by stars 59 boys embraced sleep warmly. some of our boys are dreaming of water and girls (some people call this a wet dream) some, of home—somewhere safe from canes and bullies and homework.

They have their dreams interrupted by a bearded reality carrying the name of god in a turban seeking atonement for sins with guns and bombs and fear. in Buni Yadi; 59 martyrs died for our iniquities but we still don't have salvation 4? violence is a living word a living-breathing word

4 boys walked into a quiet town and we rushed to welcome them with kisses of fire and gasoline watched it spread through the roofs, of mouths that begged for god and rain we watched with rage-deafened-ears as fire painted bones black.

in Aluu, before 1000 judges 8 eyes burnt into darkness, we called it justice.
tragedy has many portraits. it could be a mother whispering lyrics of an old song into the ears of a deaf toddler or a boy waking up in the shoes of a man he used to call father smelling of alcohol and uncertainty.

But there is a picture of tragedy that has painted itself on the walls of my mind that I have tried to clean but it won't go away:

1 man—an old friend hung on a tree chanting:

'Eli,
Eli,
Lema
Sabachthani'

Memory is not enough there are dreams that never end.
Sabar
(For Syria)

I have seen with my own eyes, the Sibyl hanging in a jar, and when the boys asked her ‘what do you want?’ she answered, ‘I want to die’

— Petronius.

1st Invocation
To wait is to die.
Every teardrop is a sea in the eyes of God.
Every gunshot every blast every wail tearing through the darkness is a missing tone in the orchestra of grief.
Hades seeks home in bodies of children in rubble in graves,
I have housed pain in my bones
But there is a little space for the peace mother offers beyond the veil so, I will wait.

2nd Invocation
To leave is to die.
On the road, outside Aleppo asphalt is painted with the blood of lost boys and running women the birds sing in silence, for new songs don't grow in throats that have grown limp from praying.

Every sunrise is a miracle, every breath is a promise waiting to be broken, to leave is to die on the sea (where the water takes and takes what is left of hope) hunger boring into intestines paralyzed by want by fear
by exhaustion,
I must wait.

3rd Invocation
To live is to die.
(My tongue wears these words well now).
I have sang it into every song every tune it feels like there is no other song left for me.
I die every time
I close my eyes to sleep
I die every time
I walk these streets
Yet,
five times every day I must gather myself into prayers and pray
and pray
and pray
and wait.
Breathe

Healing is a woman or a rainbow
or a dream (where fear comes to die—where I grow wings and float into the arms of god).
There is healing
in the touch of mother on my skin.
praying fever away with will and fire
and olive.
Healing is the smile
of my father, a miracle—like the eclipse in '01 that hid me from Gehenna till light swallowed.
There is healing
in the quiet before dawn earth surging back to life, memories gathering themselves back into bodies, children falling out of dreams—into water into love.
Healing is the laughter of a stranger on the bus home (or away from home) —she said
'laughter can drown the voice of tragedy’
—I said
'show me'
Then she burst into a river of songs.
Later that night, we held hands and drowned in a sea of laughter.

There is healing in the voice of god on a boat floating in Galilee saying:
peace be still peace be still
peace be still
peace be still
breathe!
Captive

Here is how you take prisoners:

It's in the way you walk into rooms, swaying soft like breeze commanding attention like you are god like you created it all.

It's the way you paint your name onto the tongues of men who dared to touch you who dared to whisper honey into silence?

It's the way you become magic, how you weave yourself into air and cause us to inhale you how your glassy eyes stare into our faces like you can see into the mirror of our souls like you know the colour of our sins.

Nefertiti,
you write lust on our skins and you stand afar watching us flow into softness bleed into songs beg once more for ecstasy.

that is how you take prisoners.
Conversations
(with Rafka)

Rafka: They say you are a poet, the curator of grief tell me, how can you describe a pain you haven't felt?

Pain does not have a mother-tongue no language no rhythm only taste and touch.

She touches us in different ways but we only feel her in one way.

She folds me into a shadow and teases me with light.

She carves my tears into harp and strings an orchestra of sorrow.

She says I must write, that it's my only escape from this dream so, I write.

Rafka: Where did all my sad songs go?

They came to live in my bones they said your heart got too heavy while sailing the river of days and started drowning.

They said my skin is a light house that shines only on broken things and sings:
'home is here
home is here
there are no mirrors here shadows dance to echoes here'

Rafka: What is the reason for hollow graves?

There are many reasons why silence dies;

1) Alone is always seeking companionship.
2) Hell despises hymns of solitude.
3) Eternity is the curse of time, lightnings are pictures of ghosts escaping.
4) Catacombs are imploding into rivers of songs.
5) Silhouettes of memories flock to bays reeking of nostalgia.
6) Misery tastes like white chalk on blue tongue, seeking air.
7) Empty rooms don't smell like home.
8) Lost ships still dream of shore.

Rafka,
Hollow graves got tired of waiting-for scents of flowers so they became flowers.
Dead Men
For Romeo Oriogun

3:05 AM
A boy jumps out of a watery dream into the embrace of his dark room to watch a man break himself bit by bit into love and loss.
A boy calls this man father.
Say empty rooms—
We walk back in time holding hands through corridors heavy with the stench of memory, we pick a spot in history sit, and watch our mistakes come to life again—sister (a sunflower) gets scorched I watch father dream all the dreams he couldn't live mother melts into a river of loneliness she sucks us in,
we all drown.
The universe is weaving living jokes out of dying bones but our tongues are already too heavy with the names of all the dead we carry,
so we don't laugh.
Say lost soles—
We try to trace cracks on the wheel of nostalgia with fingers that have grown weary of touching broken things (dreams, women, walls, hearts) to find where we first gathered our strength into smoke and gave it to the sky where we first lost it—the will to stand without crumbling into a sea to live without dying a little, god is rewriting hope on the skin of lost children but we can't find them we can't touch them we can't bring them home we can't make them stay.

Say dead men— Grief is the mother of loss, loss is the brother of despondency and before we got our fingers wet soiled even, snooping through wreckages of love that couldn't grow in a body besieged with want for things that don't die, before we gifted our prayers to the wind begging it to ride to the ears of god, before silence became a ritual we immersed ourselves in to survive, before the breaking,
before the healing, we had first tried to dream you back to life in different forms—in still waters in growing fire in warm air, we failed.
You mirror me,
and for you I gather desire the way birds gather sounds in a beak beckoning morning to fulfill the promise of renewal, I am gathering every dying piece of this body into a song and gifting it to the wind again, I am driftwood floating in the sea drifting, unyielding, staring into the face of god daring heaven to shatter me again.
For Women Who Break Often

Before you learnt to rewrite love on the old leaflets of your skin, you had spent nights clawing at walls that won't yield for memories that won't heal, calling for god in all the languages mother didn't teach seeking a sign or a voice
or a dream
a reason, to stop yourself from growing smaller and smaller.
Before you had come to accept that echoes are simply voices that didn't make it home and not every dream can be cradled to life inside palms scarred by thorny ardencies you first broke yourself into many waters and fed them to lost men but they rolled you in their mouths, gargled you on tongues that have forgotten the taste of affection and spat you out said you were lukewarm, too soft,
too hard,
said a woman cannot be both water
and fire.
If Anything, Be A Dream

If anything, be a dream
or an old song or a fountain drowning the sounds of silence or a prayer stuck in the throat of an old monk.
If anything, be laughter sharp loud ringing something to pierce the veil of grief an extra reason to breathe or you could be a lamp in a dark room or the rainbow after Noah or the sun after his flood.
If anything, by god please be a dove carrying a branch of olive in a beak to Syria be a shield in Aleppo be a blanket or drinking water or a safe roof for Oman.
Inamorata

Ìfé mi,
You are poetry flowing between troubled fingers, a ray of sunlight on dark mornings, piercing shield unveiling emotions I thought were gone, speaking life into my bony heart.
If tables were to suddenly turn and you ever became something distant,
something vague,
like an old song whose lyrics I have forgotten, I swear it!
I'd love you back to life, I'd whisper your name to the clouds for every time
your lips brushed mine, I'd write a poem
for every time
I saw god in your eyes, I'd worship Kutsami, ferry in his stead till he gives you back to me—Whole,
Wingless,
Warm.
Initiation
(for T.)

When you touch me the way you touch me my insides melt into a song and my tongue wants to build a city of melodies inside you.
I want to draw maps on your skin with fingers and lust, drown desire in the sea welling in your eyes, go back to Babel and tell them—how 1000 languages cannot paint you into a poem, how 5 senses are not enough to carry all of you inside of me, how 1 lifetime is too short to love you into immortality.
Introspection
(Songs for Plath)

My heart is a tomb where hope comes to live.
I go to parties of happiness to breathe, I inhale all the light around me and leave the parties when it gets dark, too dark for men to see without stumbling into sadness.
Too dark to feel for lighters that lift souls of men high.
I watch their fears colliding from a distance, I giggle.

II.
On quiet days when there are no songs left in my lungs, I write.
I like to write stories of women that died while embracing life—firmly, women we thought had too much of her in them but we never cared to look beneath their skins.
On autopsy,
the Pathologist said he found castles living inside them, castles that echoed whispers.

III.
There are nights when I dream;
I am a bird, carrying happiness within my beak flying towards a nest I do not know.
I never get home.
An angry storm breaks my beak into two, happiness dissolves into a stream of darkness.
I wake up screaming.
Sweating.
To Love is to Die

To love is to die every night hoping to wake up in a dream where love is a language, ecstasy; a song where prayers flow into rivers and children wake at dawn to fetch blessings into a gourd.
To love is to break your body into a sea hoping to find a soul trusting enough to drown inside you.
To love is to run from emptiness (the memory of home: Mother, singing songs of loneliness into the mirror Father, pouring his anger into wine)
into fire.
To love is to grow, the fusion of bodies in the darkness waiting for a sunrise—god shining his light on the miracle we made in the night.
To love is to seek,
to become a traveler or a skeptic or a gypsy knowing we might not find the fire we seek but continue to nurse the embers we found on the road hoping that someday, they grow into a sun.
Seeking Shelter

Under the bridge at Mokola, children are melting into water mothers are growing into trees.
I am a lone observer, watching the re-purification of earth
by god.
Man flowing from sand into sand, man flowing into man man becoming one with water and god.
A Memento for the Forgotten

And I am a sin because I am a little broken and don't work like I used to and I am thrown away inside a pit and covered with red soil and father says my sisters must hush that I am dissolved into memory now and must be forgotten because I am a little broken and don't work and it is dark inside this pit and it is hard to be alone and my head is banging like there is a church bell singing inside my brain and I try to cry but the water is not coming through and there are voices stuck in my throat and I try to call the name of god but he doesn't answer and I wonder if he doesn't like me too because I look like sin but mama said he loves little children and mama does not lie like pa and I don't understand why he wouldn't answer if I am truly a child and flower and innocent and helpless and crying and I close my eyes because they are heavy and tired of fighting and remember all the times I was not in a hole smelling of death and looking like sin and it is December again and my room is blue and the flowers are red and god is shining his light through the window and smiling and the choir is singing Noel on radio and I want to melt into hymns and honey but this happiness is suddenly too heavy for my heart like I am carrying dead people in my chest and I stop thinking because it hurts too and I call the name of god again and he still doesn't answer and I think maybe pa is right maybe I am truly dissolved into memory like an old dream and this is where old songs come to die and this story is almost ending now and I am still afraid of the dark but I still don't understand why god's light wouldn't reach out to me if I am truly a child and flower and innocent and helpless and crying.
RATIONALE
(Excuses for why we failed at love too) After Warsan Shire

1) Because love is never enough.
2) You smell like another man’s war.
3) Your lover’s tongue is a gypsy that is always seeking home in new women.
4) There are rooms in his heart he doesn’t want you to enter (He forgot how to enter them without first breaking into a sea or a tornado).
5) You were never enough.
6) You were too enough (There was too much of you in the air he breathes, he claimed too much love chokes people).
7) We allowed the music of silence to overwhelm the sounds of our laughter.
8) Love is a language that keeps on unsticking itself from our tongues.
9) He carries the ghosts of all his old lovers in his bones, there was no space for you to live.
10) She found warmth in the arms of a man that doesn’t look like you or her father or that Mathematics teacher from grade 4.
11) We were both looking for something that couldn’t be found in heaven and orgasms.
12) The women in your family smell of loneliness.
13) Because your love is a quicksand that takes and takes.
14) She got tired of waiting (her love aged into a valley of dry bones) 15) We were too afraid to fly, afraid the wind will break. our wings, so we settled for a middle ground (somewhere between believing and becoming)

16) Love appeared to us in the form of a shadow; we couldn't touch it, couldn't hold it, couldn't make it stay.

17) How can you love a man who moulded his own tongue into fire? (How do you make love to fire?)

18) Because forever is a myth told by lonely housewives.

19) You can't grow love out of memories; you can't trap love in a body.

20) Mother said 'not all men can be soft enough to be written into songs'; but you tried to compose a symphony for a man whose father only taught him how to be hard.

21) You can't pray bad love away.

22) Before you first learnt that another name for god is love, you had spent nights writing love in the hearts of godless men.

23) You fell for the rhetoric of the society 'Men don't love like that...'

24) Love is not your mother tongue (you tried to love a man in a language you are yet to fully understand) 25) He said your past was a pill that was too hard to swallow, a memory that won't die, a ghost that won't go home to rest.

26) Love is just a word.

27) Our passion got lost in translation.

28) She got tired of breaking.

29) The same fire that wrought love also burnt love.

30) Nana, we stopped dreaming.
Boluwatife Afolabi is a Nigerian poet and an associate poetry editor at Agbowo.org.

His poems have appeared in: Arts and Africa, Kalahari Review, African Writer, Expound Magazine, Praxis Magazine and Saraba Magazine. In 2017, he was listed on nantygreens.com as one of the top ten contemporary Nigerian poets to be read.

He lives and writes from Ibadan, Nigeria. He tweets via @oluafolabi.
SankofaMag is a platform where brave thinking and bold new voices challenge, inform and entertain the world. An avant-garde mix of storytelling and cutting-edge creativity, our contributors create timeless and compelling stories in the advancement of literature, the arts and discourse of the world's most important and intriguing topics.

SankofaMag brings a creative twist to the practice of journalism thus creating a middle-ground where literary dexterity and best practices from the journalism profession are combined to delight our audience. With foundational interests in culture, development and politics, we publish art, features, fiction, interview, podcast, poetry and focused chapbooks for the young and old.

GUIDELINES

Contributors are invited to send in up to three pieces for consideration. There are no restrictions as to topic, style or theme as long as they are related to the overall focus of the magazine in the areas of culture, development and politics.

All entries must be original, unpublished, in English and typed at 1.5 spacing in Microsoft Word. Submissions in other languages must be accompanied with English translation. Entries should be sent to engage@sankofainitiative.org and must be accompanied by a short profile and portrait picture. The word “Submission” and the entrant’s name must appear in the subject line of the email transmission.
ACCEPTANCE

Selected contributors will receive emails acknowledging receipt of their work as well as details of scheduled publication dates within six months. We acquire first electronic publishing rights. All other rights revert to the contributor after publication. Published work remains part of SankofaMag’s online archive and may be considered for the digital edition and our annual print anthologies. If the work is reprinted elsewhere, we ask that you acknowledge SankofaMag as the original place of publication.

It should be noted that selected contributors will not be paid but will enjoy a nonexclusive access to the magazine and the freedom to share its contents with the world. Where an entry is selected for publication in the digital edition or our annual anthologies, the contributor will be duly informed and will also receive a copy of the publication.